"A GENTILE SCHOOL."

Interesting "Information" Given by Backman to Party of Tourists.

As a citizen was walking along North Temple street, just east of Main, a day or two ago, he was passed by a three-seated vehicle, the owner of which makes a livelihood by carrying tourists about the city. In the rig were five persons besides the driver, and the latter was "telling" the strangers all about Salt Lake. Pointing to the LaFayette school, the man said:

"That is a Gentile school and is attended entirely by Gentile children. Fifteen years ago there were no public schools in Utah and then not until the non-Mormons took the matter in hand."

The carriage was within a few feet of the sidewalk and the driver referred to and who had distinctly heard every word, gave a significant smile. "Is that statement not true?" inquired the person bent on enlightening the pedestrians on sight seeing.

"Not a word of it is true," said the pedestrian. The other retorted, "Thirty years ago there was not a Gentile nor a public school in Utah." "I have been in Utah 40 years," said the citizen, and that long ago there were not only many Gentiles in Utah, but there were public schools from one end of the territory to the other and had been for years."

The tourists became intensely interested, and their looks gave evidence that they wished to hear further from the citizen rather than from his misinformant, but the driver whipped his horses into a trot and soon disappeared around the corner.

FORTY MEN QUIT.

They Walked Right Out and Then Walked Right Back Again.

Forty hands employed by the Taylor & Brunton Sampling Works concluded Thursday evening, that they were not receiving their full share of the general prosperity. They were receiving $2.75 for nine hours' work, which Manager Woodbridge says is better wages by 25 to 50 cents than obtains elsewhere in the valley. The men, however, thought they should be let off with eight hours work instead of nine, to improve their minds, and demanded the reduced hours of labor, which was refused. So they all quit.

However, wiser counsel prevailed later, and half the men returned to work at the old schedule of hours, and the rest came back before the day was over. No more trouble is reported.
